Discovery of a Roman Villa During Agrivoltaic Excavations in Cancello ed Arnone

Saturday 26 October 2024 Last updated 13:58

In Cancello ed Arnone, the excavations for a new agrivoltaic plant have uncovered a Roman villa, following investigations conducted under the scientific direction of the Sabap for the provinces of Caserta and Benevento. The identified remains reveal two levels of occupation, one starting from the late Republican age and reaching the beginning of the Augustan period, characterized by structures in opus reticulatum, and the other coinciding with the late Imperial age,

The area, covering a surface of 1600 square meters, has yielded exceptional elements such as cocciopesto flooring, “dolia,” or large terracotta containers used for food storage, amphorae, and foundation and elevated wall structures, along with a substantial quantity of ceramic material including a splendid Italic sigillata oil lamp with an erotic scene. These findings represent a great opportunity for the study and reconstruction of the settlement dynamics of the ager Falernus, a historic agricultural area in northern Campania established in 318 BC between Mount Massico and the Volturno along the Via Appia, well known to the Romans for the fertility of its lands.

The superintendent Mariano Nuzzo stated: “Our territory delivers another extraordinary testimony of the past. The investigations carried out have yielded not only a treasure of inestimable value but also invaluable documentary sources essential for understanding the past and for the historical and archaeological research we are promoting with extraordinary results.

The significant result achieved underscores the importance of cooperation between institutions and private entities and reminds us, once again, of the value of the protective actions carried out by the Superintendencies, which allow for the safeguarding and conservation of our cultural heritage without halting the evolutionary process of our country.”
